Chairman's report 2017

2017 saw significant changes for the Foundation. We completed a major exercise to modernise our 1972 trust deed, resulting in a simplified structure with one governing Board. We also developed a new strategy and funding approach that will fundamentally change the way we operate.

Over the past decade, the number of applications we received increased tenfold — but the chances of success dropped from over 50% to just 11% in 2017. Being mindful of the many hours organisations spend on unsuccessful applications, we decided it was time to do things differently. We wanted to develop funding processes to support sustainable, long-term social change, reduce compliance costs, and promote collaboration rather than competition.

The result is a new approach which is collaborative, community-led and pro-active. We will no longer run contestable grant rounds. Instead we'll work closely with communities to understand their issues and aspirations, and the most effective strategies to create change. Our aim is to support co-ordinated action in specific focus areas, and work closely with other funders and capability organisations to leverage the impact of our funding.

In 2018, we'll continue to focus on youth employment. We'll also begin exploring a new focus area: equitable opportunities for children and families. Our new strategy is summarised in the centre of this report; you can find more detailed information on our website.

Thank you to our forward-thinking Board who have enthusiastically led the Foundation through this change. Particular thanks to our two retiring trustees for their significant contributions: David Wale who provided invaluable guidance and governance for the Foundation's investments for 18 years; and David Murphy, whose sound advice and good humour were a feature of his eight-year term as our NZ Law Society representative. We look forward to working with Pamela Davison, who will be taking up this trustee position in 2018.

I also acknowledge our hard-working and talented staff, the Todd Family and our payroll givers for your generous donations, and the Todd businesses for your financial and in-kind contributions. Finally, a huge thanks to our community funding partners, who work every day to create "An inclusive Aotearoa New Zealand where all families, children and young people can thrive and contribute — Whakawhaiti Aotearoa, hei oranga wairua, oranga tāngata."

Malcolm Whyte, Chairman, Todd Foundation Board

Puketāpapa Community Driving School

Getting Mount Roskill locals on the road

In 2014, five organisations working in the Auckland suburb of Mount Roskill became aware that many locals — particularly young people, refugees and new migrants — needed a cheaper, easier way to get their driver licence.

Having a licence is important for finding work, and it also builds confidence and independence. But local people were missing out because they couldn't afford driving lessons and they had no car to practice in — and no-one to supervise them while they practiced. Some faced cultural and language barriers that made learning to drive more difficult.

Rather than coming up with five different programmes the organisations joined forces to set up the Puketāpapa Community Driving School, which provides low-cost driving lessons and practice driving sessions with trained volunteers in the school's dual-control car.

The project was coordinated by the PETER Collective, a group of organisations and individuals that work together to improve education and employment outcomes in Mount Roskill, and led by the Migrant Action Trust.

“Our mission is to get people to collaborate within a shared challenge,” says PETER Collective director Manawa Udy. “Otherwise what happens is you get all these different people trying to find funding for the same group of people in the same area.”

The driving school has been set up as a social enterprise. That means all its profits will go towards providing subsidised driving instruction for those who can't afford it.

Migrant Action Trust manager Honey Rasalan says the goal is to become self-sustaining as soon as possible. “We hope the community will see the value of coming to our driving school so they can help someone who can't afford to get their licence.”

Todd Foundation is supporting the Puketāpapa Driving Initiative (Migrant Action Trust) with two years of funding. This funding was allocated from our General Fund, which is now closed.

Whanganui Learning Centre

Helping whānau meet their learning needs

When Nick left school at 16 with no qualifications he never imagined that just a few years later he'd have a Level 2 Certificate in Foundation Skills, be in fulltime work and be planning to start a trade training course.

Thanks to the encouragement and support of the Whanganui Learning Centre, Nick — who admits he made a lot of bad decisions in the past — has turned his life around and he now realises that he has lots of skills he can use.

“I've gained confidence and I've really started enjoying learning.”

Nick and his sisters — one of whom has completed a Level 4 qualification in mechanical engineering — are among the many whānau groups the Whanganui Learning Centre works with each year, helping them to identify and meet their learning goals.

“We're driven by the needs of the whānau, and we build on their strengths, not their weaknesses,” says Centre manager Gail Harrison. “We work with the whole of an individual to help them meet their psychosocial and educational needs.”

In 2017 the Centre appointed an intensive case worker so it could expand the long-term work it does with whānau groups such as Nick's family. It also started a new initiative, Connecting Education and Communities, to help families in several local communities achieve their educational aspirations. Centre staff will support whānau to design their own programmes to increase their skills and confidence, and to advocate for themselves to get the support they need from schools and other education providers.

“We're not the experts, we're the facilitators,” says Gail. “It's a partnership model of sharing expertise and knowledge and potential.”

Todd Foundation is supporting the Whanganui Learning Centre with two years of funding from our General Fund (now closed). We also co-fund the Centre's Connecting Education and Communities initiative, alongside J R McKenzie Trust.

Giving young people a voice to change the criminal justice system

When social justice advocate Kim Workman set up the youth justice organisation JustSpeak in 2011 he thought it would be a sub-committee of its parent organisation, Rethinking Crime and Punishment.

Instead, JustSpeak has become an independent and important voice in the national conversation about the justice system.

“We ended up with a movement,” says Kim, who is a former Todd Foundation funding partner.

JustSpeak aims to encourage discussion by young people about the justice system. It publishes reports and makes submissions, focusing on the high Māori imprisonment rate and the growing prison population.

“Listening to young people who don’t normally get a chance to be heard provides an opportunity to think about all the assumptions we’ve made and how we’ve always done things and whether they actually work,” says JustSpeak director Tania Sawicki Mead.

In 2017 JustSpeak published a report on the bail system that sparked discussion among politicians and policymakers. It also joined forces with Mahi Tahī Trust to organise Whiti Te Rā, a two-day hui on transforming criminal justice. The hui was spurred by a Waitangi Tribunal finding that the Department of Corrections has failed Māori by not doing enough to reduce the high rates of Māori reoffending.

“The Waitangi Tribunal had done all this hard work to release the report but there was no obvious avenue to take the findings and talk about how to end what was happening,” says Tania.

About 120 people attended the hui, including politicians, judges, lawyers and staff from the Department of Corrections, as well as people who had spent time in prison.

They developed a call to action focusing on three areas — prevention; rehabilitation and reintegration; and policy and systemic change — and set up a working group to help advance these goals. Planning is now underway for a second Whiti Te Rā in 2018.

Todd Foundation has supported JustSpeak with 5 years of funding from our Partnership Fund (now closed).
